BOY SCOUTS by Pat Moynahan

Ask Shawn Marler about the impact of scouting in Northern Kentucky and he'll tell you about a fourth grader in Newport and his Boy Scout hatchet.

The youngster walks past gang members and people taking drugs on his way home from school, but he doesn't carry the hatchet to protect himself, according to Marler. He carries it to identify himself as a Boy Scout.

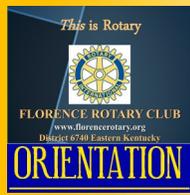

"I tell them I won't do (those things) because I'm a Boy Scout," the youngster told Marler, the Trailblazer District director for the Dan Beard Council of the Boy Scouts of America.

End Polio Now Update

The Trailblazer District covers seven counties in Northern Kentucky with more than 100 different packs. Marler, district director since last July, told members of the Florence Rotary Club at a lunch meeting on Monday, April 11, he hopes to grow the Boy Scouts into the pre-eminent non-profit organization in Northern Kentucky.

“Scouts have a love and fondness for the community,” he said. “They want to get out and make the community better.

“Scouting helps mold the leaders of tomorrow,” he added.

The need for leadership in addressing community problems is not limited to urban communities like Newport, Marler noted. There are just as many problems in the counties in his district.

However, expanding urban and rural scouting programs has been a point of emphasis for Marler in his first 10 months as district director. The district has started a Scout pack in Newport and doubled the funding for Scoutreach, a program designed to provide scouting opportunities for young people in economically disadvantaged communities, he said.

Marler also has doubled the after-school programs in the district in an attempt to give students “a place to go where they have some values.” The objective is to prepare the youngsters to be leaders who accept responsibility and care about causes other than self-interest.

The greatest challenges to growing scouting in the district are persuading schools to get involved and recruiting enough volunteers and organizational partners to expand after-school programs, Marler said.

His recruiting pitch for volunteers is simple. He’s looking for people who work for organizations “that will let you get out of the office, get some vitamin D, cut down trees and set ‘em on fire.”

That’s why they carry the hatchets.

5 QUESTIONS WITH PRESIDENT PAMELA GOETTING, PART 5

Recorder: If you could give advice to the community-at-large what would you like them to know?

Goetting: “When I took office in January one of the things I talked about in my opening remarks was that the greatest volunteers find their passion. If they find something they love and that they can get behind, they get involved and come to be amazing volunteers. I would say that people need to find whatever it is, like our Rotary programs, that you are really passionate about. Figure out what do you really care about and get behind that passion and throw yourself into it. What you get back is so much more than what you give. If people can do that they will find the time. It is such a great feeling to see improvement or success in something that is so meaningful. It doesn’t even seem like work.”
